The Third International Conference on Quality in Medicine, Global Health and Law explored the Role of Interprofessional Collaboration in Improving Quality of Care at the Time of Pandemic.

The discipline of quality management plays an essential role in effective functioning of the healthcare organizations. The first formal initiatives in this field were undertaken in Western Europe, Japan and the United States in the early 1970s, inspired by the quality control methods used in the manufacturing industry. Nowadays, hundreds of governmental agencies, non-profit, and community organizations around the world pursue research and implementation of various healthcare quality monitoring and improvement programs.

The first healthcare quality management initiatives undertaken in Poland in the early 1990s by the Polish Ministry of Health, resulted in the creation of the National Society for Quality Management in Healthcare in 1993, and in the establishment of the National Center for Healthcare Quality Monitoring in Krakow in 1994. The Center provides an essential administrative infrastructure for the training and accreditation purposes in the field of healthcare quality monitoring in Poland. Nevertheless, an ongoing training of healthcare professionals in various aspects of quality management is necessary. It can be effectively accomplished through the international collaboration encouraging the exchange of research results and ideas.

The goal of the annual conferences on Quality in Medicine, Global Health and Law held at the Scientific Center of the Polish Academy of Sciences in Paris, France, is to facilitate such collaboration among healthcare organizations and academic centers in Poland and the United States as well as other countries around the globe.

After a productive and inspiring Roundtable Meeting on Quality Improvement in Medicine held at the PAN Paris Scientific Center in April 2018, the Second PAN Paris International Conference on Quality Improvement in Medicine was held on May 15 and 16, 2019, and was focused on the role of international collaboration in improving quality of care.

The goal of Conference in 2021 was to explore the role of interprofessional collaboration in addressing the scientific, ethical, legal, social and managerial challenges emerging in the midst of an unprecedented global epidemiological and political crisis, which we have been experiencing since the beginning of 2020.

These unusually difficult times call for an unusual and novel approach to scientific gatherings. This Conference was designed to capture an instantaneous snapshot of the current situation as seen by a multidisciplinary ensemble of professionals representing a variety of backgrounds, cultures, countries, and points of view.

Our three Keynote Speakers set the stage by presenting the essence of the pandemic from the global, French and Polish perspective. The five Roundtable discussions were expected to give the audience an understanding of how the pandemic changed the policies and research priorities of leading global and regional organizations confronting the biggest challenge of our times.

Finally, the ten Interactive Panels were designed to provide information and inspiration from professionals other than frontline medical scientists and frontline healthcare workers. The Panelists were asked to give short, 5 to 10-minute, presentations (not quite an elevator speech, but close) describing the essence of their professional endeavors and lessons learned in the midst of the geo-political and epidemiological tsunami.

The discussions were anchored in the concept of quality of care defined as the degree to which the services provided to individual patients and entire populations are in compliance with four specific criteria: current scientific knowledge, professional ethical standards, applicable law, and principles of fairness and equity.

The ultimate goal of this meeting was the promotion of the scientific, academic, clinical and organizational excellence in addressing the crisis, which might very well prove to be the biggest challenge of our professional and personal lives.
